Dreams, large and small, keep coming true

I used to say that I manifested my husband, my dream man, and I suppose I did, and we have manifested a lovely life together. The bucket list has been checked off and we are not really bucket list people. Future dreams are more general – like a fulfilling, adventurous life in all the ways that can happen.

We have taken the trips, bought the convertible, the joy house, and all the “material” items. Check. We do fun experiences, like hang gliding, zip lining, sky diving, hot air balloon. Check. Now we just want to play.

Hike, bike, kayak. Paint, write, create. Explore and discover. Life keeps expanding and we are along for the ride.

We love deep chats on all kinds of subjects. We recently played a round of Vertillis (a Dutch card deck game that prompts conversation; the word vertillis means “tell me more”) and one question asked what musical artist you still wish to see.

My husband replied Michael Buble.

I saw Michael in 2009 and the show was phenomenal. After my Prince mentioned his desire, I started checking the Michael Buble website and within a week, Michael’s new tour (after several year hiatus) was announced. I joined the fan club to get presale tickets, and my sweetheart and I will be swooning for Mr. Buble when he is in Chicago this March. If that counts as a bucket list item, then check.

My list of concerts I have been to is long, long, long. I have seen all my beloveds. The only person still on my dream list is Robbie Williams. I became a Robbie devotee when I lived in France way back in 2005 and 2006. He’s not famous in America, but is the most celebrated pop icon across the world, and a national treasure of the UK. I have followed his tours and life over the years online and never pulled the trigger to travel overseas for a huge stadium concert.

And now I don’t have to. Robbie will be in Las Vegas for a handful of shows in 2019. His first, and I just got tickets. Even though he is not known in the states, the shows sold out in a flash. The British are coming. They love Vegas, and they love Robbie.

My point: things keep falling into place. Dreams keep coming true. I follow my soul nudges, the little niggles in my heart. And not just for concert tickets. For all things. Invitations to accept and those to decline. What to write and what to save for later. What to read or watch or attend. What to do next.

By KELLY SIMMONS
Columnist

As we approach another new year, once again I am in awe of how fast the calendar pages turn. The passing of time no longer makes me feel a tinge of sadness or bittersweetness. It’s simply a reminder to be grateful for every day past and for all those that lie ahead.

My Prince Charming and I just turned 54. We, in theory, have 40 more years ahead of us. FORTY YEARS! That’s a long time. That excites me, thrills me, delights me. Oh the plans and ideas we have! Oh the magic that is still to come!

We are planning the year ahead, in some small ways, and also being open to the miracles yet to be revealed. Do you look at life that way? Do you believe that the things you want, material or otherwise, (like concert tickets) will come to you? Do you follow the whisper inside that guides you, in all ways, large and small?

Will you let 2019 be the year you start?

When life isn't a bummer – not really

It’s such a bummer when on a normal day when you have nothing else planned you get a phone call from your daughter asking if you can babysit your granddaughter for an hour or two and you of course say yes then proceed to spend that babysitting time just cuddling and listening to her coo and giggle. My day was a bummer.

It’s such a drag when a friend from out of town calls unexpectedly telling you they are in town and want to have lunch in an hour and you have to quit folding laundry to go and meet the friend and have a nice lunch with them spent catching up and sharing some laughs. Today was a major drag.

It’s such drudgery when you have a big grocery list and you have to go to the store and fill your cart with food and other goodies and it’s such a hassle to pack it all up, bring it home and then put it all away because that is time-consuming and time is money baby and at the end of it all you don’t even really think about the fact that you were able to pay for food for your family for the entire week without going into debt or scrimping on something. Today was filled with drudgery and hassles.

It’s bothersome and downright exasperating when, in the middle of the night, the dog or cat or maybe both want to cuddle with you in bed and they take up space

By JILL PERTLER
Contributor

and their fur gets in your face and one of them even snores, but they love you unconditionally so you make room and indulge in a little snuggling. Last night was bothersome and downright exasperating.

It’s such a pain, early in the morning, when you half-wake up and want to go back to that really great dream you were having but you peek at the clock and it’s just about time for the alarm to go off and you are still tired and don’t want to start your day just yet and then you remember it’s Saturday and you don’t have to get up and you can sleep in for another hour or two and you pull up the covers and go right back to that great dream. Last Saturday morning was a pain.

It’s irksome when the day is short but activities are long and you have to hop from one thing to the next because you are pulled in at least two but probably three or even four different directions and you have to leave one game early to make it to the last half of another scrimmage and all this is before the choir or band concert and you are tempted to skip something but then one kid might feel shorted so you go and find yourself enjoying the game and the scrimmage and the music – each at its own pace and you realize these days are fleeting and there will come a time when you have an entire unencumbered day and evening and you will look back and remember these busy times with fondness. Many of my days are irksome.

It can be easy, or maybe better put, lazy, to live our days, our hours, our moments with blinders on. To be focused on our present situation and find a change to our routine as an annoying disruption to the important ho hum of our day. Or we embrace our normal routine as mundane without appreciating all it holds.

It’s easy to get into a tizzy or fret about a particular situation. I often do. But then when I convince myself to take the blinders off the big picture comes into view and I see the scope of it all and that realization is like a warm blanket unfolding over top of me. There is much to fret about. Always will be. But there is much, much more to not fret about. I choose door number two.
